

Case Study

As one of the most recognisable and profitable companies in the world, Apple has historically been driven by a B2C selling model where products are sold directly to the customer or through Apple's distribution/carrier channels. This model has incrementally changed over the last five years through key partnership alignment within the software ecosystem.

Alliance-based partnerships with industry players such as SAP, Cisco, and IBM were established and leveraged by Apple with the intention of enabling enterprise customers to benefit from Apple-based technology in a more customisable setting. Additionally, layers of technological capability could be deployed within a given technology stack, providing an added benefit for these partners.

This was a marked departure for Apple. For the first time in their long and storied history, we see a customisable OS blended with app development capabilities to enable transformational-based execution across the enterprise space.

Selected's Mandate

We were tasked with facilitating hiring increases across Apple's new B2B enterprise software sales channels and SI teams. We were given 20 positions across the UK, Benelux, French, and German markets.

We were also required to disseminate information about Apple's B2B go to market service while also managing the interview process from start to finish and informing Apple of prevailing market trends.

“We engaged Harry Brown and the team at Selected during an accelerated hiring phase to help us work through high volume hiring whilst maintaining the quality of candidacy that Apple strives to attract. Harry and his team were prompt in providing a proposal with their sourcing strategy on how to approach talent across the geographical spread that we were looking to recruit in. The team at Selected were quick to grasp the brief and very rapidly commenced identifying suitable talent for us through their networks and other proactive means.

The service that Harry and the team have provided has resulted in us engaging them on other areas of our business, particularly where we require a more complex search in a candidate short or highly competitive market.

Harry and the staff at Selected work with laser focus precision to identify the market's best talent and ensure thoroughness in their delivery at every stage through the process - be that market mapping, industry insights, candidate qualification, expectation setting, offer management etc.

I have no hesitation in recommending Selected as a very competent, efficient and highly effective search/contingent firm.”
